Even in this 21st century, designers still use Photoshop because it remains a popular and effective way to create professional, printed graphic design. But sometimes you don't have a printer available, or you have one available but don't have the design skills or tools to design something in it that looks good. That's when you'll need a little help, and you might need to do a little "shopping" of your own — that is, investigate the tools available to you. In this article, we'll introduce you to the best free online photo editing tools, and we'll also tell you how to use them as well, to help you have more control over your photos. Knowing how to use online photo tools is a great skill to have, as they not only enable you to "shop" for yourself, but you can also save money on future printing costs. Plus, you can learn the fundamentals of Photoshop while having fun as well. The best online photo editing tools So which tools are the best? Let's discuss our picks: Lightroom If you have the Adobe Creative Cloud service, you are now getting Lightroom 5, and with it comes some basic photo-editing tools as well as a basic gallery creation tool. You can create slideshows, create slideshows within slideshows, and create simple black-and-white images. Lightroom's tools are basically similar to those in Photoshop, but you can't do complex projects like overlapping layers or masks. You're limited to basic shapes and changes to the brightness and contrast. If you want to do more advanced photo editing, you have to switch to Photoshop, or you can download a standalone Lightroom app (such as the PicsArt Studio app) that will let you do basic editing. Luminance Luminance is another basic photo-editing app, a free download. You create photos into the main grid and can zoom in on certain parts of the image. Luminance has about 40 different "tools" that you can use. You can add a special effect, resize, crop, add text and lines, and select specific parts of the image. It's a good choice for beginners, and it's also easy to use. However, it does have the same basic limitations of other online tools — for example, it does not have the tools that Photoshop has. The perfect place to read your favourite book... Main menu Post navigation Reading Again My father died at the end of February, and I've been rather busy with my studies and living in a different city. I'm back in Leicester now, and as I'm on a bit of a book break, I thought I'd offer this post as a way of reconnecting with some old friends. I'll try to make this post a series, where I post my current obsession. So, with that in mind, here goes... My current obsessions are maps and words. I'm currently reading a collection of lectures by the great linguist, Michel Brion, and his book about nationalism in Africa. It's called "Nationalism: An Economic and Political History." It's a great book, and a little bit of a dry one, but the breadth of the subject is fantastic. By the way, I don't know if these are directly related, but I heard of this book while listening to a BBC World Service radio programme about slavery in Britain, where one of the former slaves interviewed discussed the reason why the marooned slaves couldn't resist enslavement. He said that the reason for this was their isolation and lack of access to networks. The reason that this was the case is because they had all been sold on either the East Coast of Africa or the West Coast of Africa. This is interesting because the slaves were marooned in the West Coast. This part of the world was controlled by the Portuguese, and by the time the British arrived in the 1500's, the Portuguese had set up a colony in the area. So the slaves had never been apart from the Portuguese. They were brought to this place, and then sold onto other trading posts, which were all connected by the slave trade. They had never experienced any kind of connectedness or network, so when they were sold, they couldn't think of anything else except being a slave. I'm also reading a book called "The Faces of Hunger." This is a collection of images that are linked to issues of human rights, hunger and poverty. I find these images very powerful and disturbing. They seem to me to be a representation of global poverty, in a way that I haven't seen before. They're very stark and complex,

July 16, 2009 — Richard Wolters How to make a good photograph The following article by Brian Ashcraft originally appeared in the October 1992 issue of The Prague Post. The sad truth is that photography, with its technical and almost magical ability to capture light and space, is losing its hold on the current moment. But with that equation stands the marvelous chance of making some beautiful and informative images — perhaps even to change our lives. What to shoot Despite the dynamic subject of the new millennium, many people are unaware of photographic techniques. For many, the techniques may be difficult to understand. When the camera is involved, it is an infinitesimal part of the vast world around us; we're too busy to take a minute out of our busy days to learn about photography. Our friend Stefan Hernández-Díaz helps us to understand what photography is — and what it isn't. 'The aim of photography,' he says, 'is the making of pictures – not movies or paintings. A photograph is a very good means of recording the real world. A record or a memory of something that happens to us.' This idea seems to be a little out of reach for most of us who are dragged daily from the jungle of the world we live in; we take pictures of things that interest us, or that concern us, but we don't think of the reality of the moment. We're busy, we're doing the buying and selling, or have to go to work or school or to the dentist. It's not that we don't notice that something wonderful is happening, but we don't see it as something that needs recording. Hernández-Díaz's argument: 'Stop a moment. Look around you. What do you see? You'll see all of the world. As we all live in a world of photographable things, there is no reason for the world of the photographable to be a separate space from the rest of the world; it should be part of it, and make part of us.' Focusing on the landscape, he explains to us something which should be common sense: 'The rest of the world is in focus and in focus in every second of the day, and because of this, photographic reality is everywhere
