Reading aloud is vital for early literacy and fundamental to later literacy, as reading proficiency is the precursory step in the learning of a reading skill. Reading aloud typically results in increases in lexical-semantic processing, sentence processing, and decoding speed. Studies have demonstrated that the reading aloud demands of the preschool years help children improve both comprehension and memory. To reach the recommended benchmarks of 85% accuracy for decoding and 90% accuracy for comprehension, children in the first grade should achieve near-adult levels of reading aloud. Consequently, there is growing evidence that reading aloud proficiency is a strong predictor of literacy success in the elementary years, and high-quality reading aloud experiences early in life may set children on track for lifelong reading skill development. Although older children are more likely than preschool-aged children to read silently, the "best practice" is that children read aloud with a speech-language pathologist (SLP). The first purpose of this study is to review the effect of reading aloud versus silent reading on the language of preschoolers, and second, to examine how to implement the most effective program for increasing

Get Free.Q: What does this soft error on a log4j.properties file mean? I ran into this issue in my development environment when I try to run a unit test on a Java Spring app. The issue is that the test runs fine, and when I run a debug on the class the application displays a stack trace and a few other info messages, but it looks like it's running the class (no exceptions, no log4j errors and there is no error). I can't find anything meaningful here. A: This is an expected behavior. As the stack trace gives you the point in the code that is executing, the call stack is as follows: findNodesInCommons(Collection) after calling the method you have: getAllNodes() And finally what is returned is null: ExampleNode.getNodes() meaning your stack trace starts at the 'getNodes()' method call. Just use this instead to make it 648931e174
