a few months ago, one of the people who are in charge of the software that runs the nsa's $1.4bn surveillance dragnet spotted some odd activity in the agency's internal network and notified his bosses. a systems administrator in hawaii had installed a program that was surreptitiously uploading to the server at least 400 gigabytes of private data about ordinary americans each week. the data was being sent to a hacker in eastern europe, the person on the other end of the connection later told officials at the hawaii isp. the data was transferred to the web server that stored all the agency's intercepted communications and then, over a period of years, to the agency's own computers. the system administrator also installed a virus that infected other users' machines. the man's identity is unknown, and federal authorities appear to have concluded that he was not a suspect in any crime. the incident exemplifies a new capability for the intelligence community, a network connection commonly called the deep web that allows the transfer of data to the government with little fear of interception. unlike the internet, where its data may be available for any user to access, the deep web requires special software and passwords to give users access. many of its sites are invisible to the average browser.

three years ago, the obama administration released a draft privacy policy that would limit the nsa's ability to search the private network for americans' communications. that draft has never been adopted. technology companies with the government's blessing have helped to construct the deep web, with companies like facebook and google giving the government data about users' online activity that might otherwise be difficult to gather. an employee of one of the big search engines tells the new york times that a site on which government surveillance software is available has been visited by 10,000 to 20,000 users a day for the past three years. the software can be used to eavesdrop on internet traffic to listen in on conversations or read e-mails. 5ec8ef588b
