conjunctivitis in the rhinologists: a pilot investigation. Allergic conjunctivitis (AC) may impair quality of life. Because it represents a diagnostic challenge and is a morbid condition that should be properly treated, the aim of our study was to determine the rate of AC among rhinologists and to evaluate what kind of symptoms they reported. We performed an anonymous cross-sectional survey. The survey included up to 3 questions about the most bothersome symptoms, the frequency of AC in daily practice and its impact on daily life. Among the 202 surveyed rhinologists, 49.5% (95% CI: 43.1-55.8) reported the presence of AC. Conjunctivitis was seasonal and correlated positively with allergy and rhinosinusitis.
Nonsteroidal anti-inflammatory drugs and intranasal corticosteroids were the most frequently used drugs. Patients presented mild symptoms; they seldom consult a physician and typically improve with topical treatment. Conjunctivitis is common among rhinologists and correlates with allergy and rhinosinusitis.
These data may be useful to define local and national allergy guidelines, optimize resources and to promote education campaigns. Leading specialist race car driver Andy Wallace will be
